

Here in the United States, choice and options have been considered a norm for our democratic society. Yet, here in San Antonio, TX, the tenth largest city in the U.S., choice is not always there when it comes to media coverage. Instead of healthy competition we have monopolies by a select few (Clear Channel, Time Warner Cable). Consequently, prices go up while choices come down. Then, the moral value of the material leaves little for families raising children. When they are not in school, programming exposes them to violence and sexuality that impacts and influences their fragile young minds into corrosive thinking and destructive behavior patterns. I have gotten to the place where I refuse to support or pay for such limited family oriented programming. It is time that we return to moral and ethical standards that promote integrity within the American household.
